that the right and moral laws were the foundation of the government, and that no government could long exist without being right and observing of the moral law and justice.

In the course of his remarks the Congressman made some sly digs at the habits of politicians which the clergymen appeared to enjoy very much. Speaking of the attempt of politicians to dodge the slavery issue and bulk Lincoln. Mr. Cockran said:

"Politicians then, as now, had an unconquerable tendency to dodge that question, and to formulate policies by dodging and pat themselves on the breast with the remark that they had established new principles. That was just as common among politicians of that day as it is to-day. The young politician is the only one, if he is nearnest, from whom you may expect any progress. The old politician, by balancing himself on a tight-rope so long, loses the possibilities for direct movement."
